THERE'RE THINGS TO DO FOR BEEKEEPERS IN FALL

The busy bee can keep his keeper busy too.
John M. Amos, associate entomologist at VPI, says that like cattle, bees in many parts of Virginia have had less forage to feed on during the recent drouth. The dry summers of the last three years have materially reduced the clover stands in many pastures. Other "honey plants" likely to suffer from prolonged drouth, in addition to the various kinds of clover, are vetch, basswood, sourwood, sumac, and asters.
Some parts of the state had a good honey flow early this season. But if too much honey was removed, or if the honey flow is light, the bees may have to be fed if they survive the winter.
Amos says when colonies do not have a shallow super of honey—35 to 40 pounds or more—feed them sugar syrup made of two parts of sugar to one part of water until late October and early November is a good time to feed bees. The overall weight of the hives with a shallow super should be between 75 and 100 pounds for the colony to winter properly and build up to producing strength next spring without feeding them again then. You can judge if the colony needs feeding by lifting the rear of the hive with one hand. A little practice will give you good judgment.
Some colonies may need as much as 25 pounds of sugar to keep from starving. Feed at the top of the entrance to the colony or directly over the top of the frame.
Requeening in the fall will help make the conoly productive. Queens may be bought from a reliable breeder and put in after removing the undesirable queen. Follow directions on the pack, or ask the county agent for Bulletin 178, which will tell you how to do lots of other things too.
When cold weather comes, make the entrace smaller to keep mice out and reduce air circulation. In some areas a temporary artificial wind break will help. Skunks are often troublesome. They scratch on the hive and eat the bees when they come out to guard the entrance. Keep them out of the bee yard by using a fence or trapping.

NEWS FOR VETERANS

Post-Korean veterans now have three years from the date of their discharge to start Korea GI Bill training, under a new law signed by the President August 20, 1954.
Particularly benefitted are the majority of veterans discharged before August 20, 1952. Under the old law, they had to start training before August 20 of this year. But since most fall school terms begin in September, those unable to get in training before that deadline would have lost their entitlement.
The new law, which re-established their entitlement for another year from their date of separation, permits those with extended deadlines to enroll for the fall term.
For veterans discharged after August 20, 1952, the new law allows them to start training within three years of their separation date. Under the old law, they had only two years.
But veterans who were separated before August 20, 1951 still will not be able to make fall terms this year. Neither will veterans separated shortly after that date, whose three-year deadlines end before the 1954 school year begins.
The new law also adds another year to the wind-up of the Korean GI Bill training program. Training now must come to an end within eight years from the date of a veteran's separation, or eight years from the end of the present emergency period—whichever comes first. It previously was seven years.
Another section of the law benefits some disabled veterans who have not been able to begin or complete training under the special vocational training program for disabled veterans of World War II and post-Korea.
These veterans get a four-year extension in their deadline for completing training, in crtain cases.
